All Trails Lead to Rock Springs

Initially part of the natural migration trail of the Cherokee Indian Tribe, commonly called the Cherokee Trail, Sweetwater County, Wyoming was the early home of Mountain Men and Fur Trappers.

Once purchased under President Andrew Jackson with the Louisiana Purchase, Meriwether Lewis and William Clark launched four expeditions of the Green River, starting in 1805, from Sweetwater County to map the western United States.

As part of the Westward Migration, the area was used by emigrants enroute to Oregon and California via the Oregon Trail. Parting of Ways in northern Sweetwater County is where groups would take a break and decide if they would split into the group going to Oregon or form another group choosing California as a destination. The path through Sweetwater County also provided an easier crossing of the Rocky Mountains for Mormons pushing handcarts to settle Salt Lake City.

As people settled in the west, a young group of horsemen was hired to deliver mail via the Pony Express and stage stations emerged along the route in Sweetwater County to support cross-country travel and fresh horses for the riders.

Union Pacific Railroad began surveying a route to connect the east and the west. The visible coal deposits and the abundant waters of the Green River made Sweetwater County an obvious selection for development -- resulting in the incorporation of Rock Springs in 1890.

As Americans turned to vehicles for transportation, the Lincoln Highway followed the route of the railroad, with large portions of the highway being turned into Interstate 80 in 1956, the longest Interstate Highway, which spans more than 2,900 miles, was built to connect the west coast in California to the east coast in New York City.

Whether you're headed to Oregon, Yellowstone National Park or New York-- all trails lead to Rock Springs, Wyoming. We hope you enjoy some of the many historical sites that demonstrate our long and unique experiences during your stay.
